Chlamydia pneumoniae is the most common infectious agent of human atherosclerosis. Our aim was to characterize the protein expression of lung lymph node cells by 2-D DIGE proteomic analysis as an attempt to clarify the role of this bacterium in the pathogenesis of atherosclerosis and pulmonary infections. Mice were intranasally inoculated with C. pneumoniae and the lymph nodes were harvested 5 days later. Proteins from cell lysates were separated on 2-D DIGE gels using fluorescent dyes in a reproducible manner. A total of 227 spots were detected corresponding to 117 unique proteins. Forty-five spots were up-regulated and 31 spots were down-regulated at 5 days after infection. The up-regulation of apolipoprotein A-1 was confirmed at the protein level. Among the proteins that were down-regulated, a series of proteins implicated in inflammatory responses were identified. By analysis of a previously generated database of proteins associated with various cardiovascular diseases, these proteins were also found to be associated with the progression of atherosclerosis. Among them, cathepsin D was included in an immuno-histochemical study of aortic sections and was found to be expressed in smooth muscle cells. In conclusion, proteomic analysis using 2-D DIGE was found to be useful in the characterization of the cellular expression of host proteins in response to C. pneumoniae infection.

Moreover, our results suggest that proteome profiling may be useful in identifying the processes that promote or modulate the progression of atherosclerosis. Measurement and calculation of the lung volume-pressure curve. To measure lung volumes, we assessed the tidal flow-volume curve by the single-breath method using a pneumotachograph connected to a unit for volumetric measurement. The validity and reproducibility of the method were
