And, I think this is being driven home with the recent change in the regulations: (2) Eliminate the tandem element of the requirement. The tandem element (the person who is not the pilot) must be capable of providing, among other things, "enough guidance to prevent the airplane from flying into terrain and to prevent the airplane from becoming uncontrollable due to its own actions." The reason for this prohibition on the possibility of the pilot driving the airplane while the Tandem is in an uncontrolled state (e.g. airsick) is that "a pilot must be awake to drive the airplane. But, the CFI now has a dual mandate: Guide (i.e. provide enough guidance to ensure the airplane safely landed and stay in control) AND Drive (i.e. be awake to fly the airplane). So, here's my proposal: We focus on GETTING the Tandem to a controlled state, while the pilot is asleep. Oh, yeah: We've also heard from student pilots that it is easier to land with a Tandem who is asleep, because that is when their senses are still more acute. The probable solution for the CFTS isn't what I can figure out, but it does involve conditioning the novice pilot to learn to drive a Tandem while asleep. We've also heard from student pilots that it is easier to land with a Tandem who is asleep, because that is when their senses are still more acute. For those with very good flight sense, most pilots on their best day are better with a dead Tandem than a live one! But, that is not to 3e33713323
