has questions about Giannis Antetokounmpo. That's the takeaway from Marc Stein's podcast with Bucks head coach Jason Kidd, who said the team is holding Antetokounmpo to a much higher standard than the rest of the roster. "He's one of those guys, he has to be better. We're not going to let him get away with things that the rest of the team, the rest of the guys, are allowed to do, not as much," Kidd told Stein. "Because if we do, we're going to get beat. He's one of those guys. We can't be as soft on him. He's so talented. He's so gifted. It's just up to him and how hard he wants to play." Kidd's outspokenness stands in stark contrast to the way Bucks management has handled Antetokounmpo, who has been inconsistent and injury-prone throughout his short NBA career. Prior to the 2015-16 season, Antetokounmpo was seemingly headed to a breakout season that would turn him into one of the league's premier young talents. Instead, the Bucks traded him to the Greek team Olympiacos and went on to miss the playoffs that season.

Antetokounmpo didn't return to the NBA until the following season. "He had the best year of his career, to be quite honest with you," Kidd told Stein. "Last year, he had a down year. I don't know if it was one day, one moment, something, because we didn't do anything different. We didn't change anything. I think we just didn't play good, we didn't play smart. And he was hurt. We'll see. He's young. I think if he doesn't work hard, if he doesn't put in the work in the summertime and things like that, when it's time to play and he's not physically ready, he'll suffer." Kidd was clear in his stance on Antetokounmpo's performance.
